

School Counselor

Advocating For Our Role

Brief Summary

What do school counselors do?

As professionals, we are continually answering this question as we advocate for our profession. To promote advocacy, the American School Counselor Association suggests to “speak up, reach out, and always use your data.”

Our Foundation of School Counselor

Beliefs Chart

- All students have dignity and worth and can achieve high standards that will result in their success.
- All students are unique, and when given a safe, nurturing environment, will succeed to their fullest potential
- All students have the right to be advocated by a school counselor and to be heard and treated with respect.
- All students are entitled to the collaborative efforts of the school support team, parents, administrators, community members, and teachers.
- The developmental needs of students are best met through implementation of a data-driven comprehensive school counseling program. This program should recognize and respect all students' individuality and special needs, including ethnic, cultural, racial, and gender differences.

Our Role as School Counselor

- Responsibility To Students
- Responsibility To School
- Responsibility To Parents and Guardians
- Responsibility To Self

It is Important to collaborate because.....

To succeed our program we must be able to do Direct and Indirect Counseling

Direct services are face-to-face services with our students (whether in our office or the classroom) and where we love to spend the majority of our time.

Indirect services include organizing and facilitating meetings with school stakeholders to help ensure our students' needs are being monitored and addressed.

The Advocacy That We Should Focus Right Now is.....

“Mental Health In School”

Mental Health In School Advocacy, What should we know...

Why We Care

The last year has been challenging for everyone. Even at the beginning of the pandemic, one survey found that 29% of parents believed their child's mental or emotional health was already harmed due to uncertainty and fear.

Taking the pandemic out of the equation, kids have to deal with a lot of daily stress. Whether it's handling a hard home life, dealing with social issues, or struggling in school, it's not uncommon for their mental health to suffer.
